PREFACE

Teachers of history are fairly well agreed both upon the desirability of collateral reading for their students and upon the difficulty of providing adequate facilities for this kind of work. The present book is designed to minimize this difficulty, first, by disclosing the surprisingly large amount and variety of material for English history to be found in almost any library; second, by suggesting definite topics for the students to follow up in their reading; third, by providing definite references which the students can easily find for themselves. It is hoped that teachers and librarians, on the one hand, may thus be relieved from much arduous and time-consuming labor; and that, on the other, students and other readers may be enabled to work effectively and with dispatch.

From the Table of Contents it will be seen that the work consists essentially of two parts: first, a Book List of works referred to, and second, Topics and References covering the whole field of English history and including the colonies. Some features of the Book List may here be pointed out for the benefit of those who may use the book. The compiler in selecting the works to be referred to began by preparing a list of the works recommended by the various bibliographies, excluding such books as students would not be apt to use. With this list as a basis, a number of typical university and city libraries were carefully gone over, and books which were not to be found on their shelves were dropped from the list as being inaccessible. Other books met with in these libraries were added if they appeared useful. In this way the Book List was automatically regulated, and as an important consequence each title in the list has been taken at first hand from the title-page, and it is hoped may be thoroughly depended upon even to the smallest particular.

In preparing the Book List a reasonable number of bibliographies and other aids have been included in order to enable any one who so wishes to carry his investigations to a more scholarly completeness. These are in the First Division, pages 3–51. Division II of the Book List embraces works which cover more than one dynasty or general chronological period; while Division III includes those which fall entirely within some one general period.

Part II, pages 165–468, consists of Topics and References arranged in eighty-seven sections, which fall into nine groups. The arrangement of the sections according to the reigns of monarchs, and of the groups according to the duration of dynasties, is not due to any predilection of the compiler, but to the practical consideration that books are largely written along these lines and are in this way most readily broken into references. Each dynastic group usually closes with a general section devoted to society or institutions, because many works devote space at those points to a consideration or recapitulation of such topics. Each section contains a summary of subtopics. Here again the compiler has not sought to force his material into any preconceived mold, but has merely collected it and arranged the usual well-known topics and expressed them in the most commonly used phrases. If by chance unsuitable topics have crept in, it is to be hoped that no one will waste time in hunting them up.

In each section, following the summary, are to be found references to Sources, which are for the most part a little more difficult for the untrained reader to use than the Modern Accounts which follow. He who reads in the Sources, however, will eventually be richly repaid, experiencing a satisfaction and attaining historical insight not vouchsafed to readers who keep to the beaten track of the Modern Accounts.

The references in Modern Accounts, Group I, are of a nature especially suitable for high-school students, although generally available for other readers. In Group II are found the references to works of a more advanced character intended for college students and general readers. Here attention might be called to the fact that the references given in the successive sections to the Dictionary of National Biography form in effect a unique chronological index of the historically important articles in that valuable work.

Following Modern Accounts comes the Bibliography, designed to facilitate further reading. The two paragraphs devoted to Illustrative Material — Poetry and Prose — were originally intended as appendices, but were assigned to their present positions in order to be more readily available. In the case of the Illustrative Material, the titles and other data are given largely on the authority of others, who are indicated, and to whom our indebtedness is duly acknowledged. These paragraphs are independent of the Book List and Index, and may be said to be in the nature of appendices to the several sections.

The Index at the close of the work refers by number to the titles of the Book List from which one using the references in Part II can easily obtain full bibliographical information about any work referred to. Owing to the method followed in the references of giving chapters as well as pages, it will often be found that other editions than the ones stated can be used equally well.

Because of the difficulty of making insertions in such a book while it has been going through the press, almost no new material appearing since January 1, 1907, when the manuscript was closed, has been included. It will be noticed that no references are starred as being superior to others. A book or a reference may be valuable from one point of view but not from another. Again, the compiler has sought only to assist the teacher and not to usurp the latter's proper place as the adviser of his students. Readers who desire special bibliographical criticism are referred to the bibliographical aids noted in the Book List.

In conclusion, the writer wishes gratefully to acknowledge the painstaking care of Messrs. Ginn and Company, and their unfailing courtesy and patience in what must have been a most trying task. He desires also to express his indebtedness to the librarians and other friends who have done so much to lighten his labors. Special acknowledgment is due to Mr. Leonard Taylor Lemon, of Richmond, Indiana, for the considerable assistance he has afforded in the preparation of this work. Miss Josephine C. Smith, M.A., of the North Des Moines High School, has generously contributed the paragraphs of Illustrative Material.

GENERAL NOTE (for this and succeeding sections). To save space the compiler has employed the term "[Bibl.]" after some references in the paragraphs of Modern Accounts, Group I, and in the paragraphs of Sources to indicate the existence of bibliographical aids in the works referred to. Furthermore, it seems unnecessary in these bibliographical paragraphs to be constantly referring to bibliographical works which are useful for long periods. A number of the text-books and source books contain bibliographical apparatus of considerable value. Brief reading lists are contained in the guides or reference lists (see Part I, nos. 298–310). See also in GROSS, Sources (no. 120), especially the Tables of the Principal Sources, App. D; GARDINER and MULLINGER, Introduction to Eng. History (no. 118), Part II; New England History Teachers' Association, Historical Sources (no. 307), and History Syllabus (no. 307); articles in the encyclopædias and other bibliographical works (e.g., nos. 145–175), especially The Dictionary of National Biography (no. 164), under the names indicated in each section. The term "passim" is hereafter omitted in the bibliographical paragraphs, although the references are frequently applicable to several sections.

Modern Accounts, Group I. ADAMS, G. B., French Nation, 14–22. ANDREWS, C. M., England, 1. CHEYNEY, England, ii, 14–19;

[1] In using the sources the reader should bear in mind: first, that the so-called "sources" are not always contemporary, but are often only approximately so, as distinguished from modern accounts; second, that authors of "sources" often began their accounts by drawing upon previous writers (sometimes otherwise lost to us), and that these accounts become of more importance as the author approaches his own times; third, that "sources" are often from uncritical and even unreliable authors. Thus in the references given above, Nennius (c. 800 A.D.) and Geoffrey of Monmouth (1147) are quite uncritical, and their accounts of this period are valuable mainly as furnishing the material for much English literature; Henry of Huntingdon (who died c. 1155) is not contemporaneous, but borrows largely from Bede (731) and the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle; Bede in turn draws on Orosius (c. 400) and Gildas (c. 550); while that part of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle which covers the first five centuries was apparently inserted during the reign of King Alfred (892). [1] The sections on society (i.e. 14, 22, 30, 37, 47, 60, 70, 80) contain topics which are best studied in a large way over considerable periods of time. They also afford a valuable means of review, especially as many works are so written as not to be readily analyzed into short periods, and are therefore referred to in these sections.

SECTION 70

State of Society, 1689–1789

Summary. The constitution: party government; unity and responsibility of the cabinet; decrease of royal influence as seen in the veto, 1707; superiority of the Commons to the Lords (Tory peers, 1712); the prime minister; parliamentary corruption; defects in representation; lack of confidence in Parliament (Gordon Riots); actual and attempted reforms; freedom of the press, 1694; Wilkes and free elections, 1769–1782; failure of secrecy in the Parliament. — The "Industrial Revolution": the spinning jenny, 1764; the water frame (Arkwright, 1769); power loom; steam engine (James Watt, 1769); the factory system; new manufacturing centers; roads (Telford, Macadam, 1800, etc.); canals, 1761; coal; iron; improvements in agriculture; renewal of enclosures. — Finance: beginning of the National Debt, 1692; the Bank of England, 1694 (William Patterson); Newton and the mint, 1695, etc.; mercantile companies; lotteries; the South Sea Company; the panic of 1720 (connection with Law's panic in France). — Religion: lack of religious interest in the early eighteenth century; the Oxford "Methodists" (John and Charles Wesley, George Whitefield); character and methods of the new preaching; separation of the Methodists from the Established Church; the "Evangelical movement." — Science, education, literature: adoption of the Gregorian calendar, 1752; foundation of the British Museum, 1753; Dryden, Locke, Newton, Defoe, Swift, Steele, Addison, Pope; the Tatler, 1709–1711; the Spectator, 1711–1714. — Ireland: status of a conquered country; lack of leaders; penal laws of the Irish Parliament concerning property, education, and religion; trade laws; emigration to America; partial Home Rule, 1782. — Colonization and empire: for India, see Sect. 81 below; for Australasia, Sect. 84 [For the American colonies in 1760, see CHANNING and HART, Guide (no. 301), Sect. 133]. — Summary of the period, 1689–1789.

SECTION 87

The British Empire as a Whole

Summary. Present government of the colonies: the colonies having responsible government; the colonies having semi-responsible or representative government; the crown colonies; protectorates; spheres of influence; subordinate colonies; chartered companies; colonies under the foreign office; the crown as the one constitutional bond. — Other bonds of empire: race; traditions and ideals; language and literature; social organization; science; education; religion; pride in imperial citizenship; legal advantages; opportunities for careers; trade; ease of communication; need of defence. — Disadvantages and dangers of the present situation: colonial projects of other nations; diversity of local interests; lack of colonial influence in the regulation of foreign policy; consequent temptation to independent action by the colonies (e.g., Queensland in Borneo); lack of colonial representation in the imperial parliament; imperial burdens of the mother country. — Movements for imperial federation or for closer union for special purposes; as for defence, intercourse, migration, legislation, trade policy: Imperial Federation League; United Empire Trade League; British Empire League; The Imperial Federation Defence Committee; The Unity of the Empire Association; colonial societies; Intercolonial Conference at Ottawa, 1894; attitudes of leading men (John Bright, Chamberlain, Randolph Churchill, Gladstone, Kipling, Lubbock, Rhodes, Rosebery, Salisbury); Jingoes and Great Englanders vs. Little Englanders. — Problems and difficulties of closer union: selection of the colonies fit for participation in imperial government; rule of the represented colonies over the rest; status of India; degree of influence to be retained by the mother country; tariff vs. free trade; degree of mutual aid for local needs; balancing of colonial participation with colonial responsibilities; difficulty either of a new imperial parliament or of remodeling the present one; partial admission to government by means of colonial agents and consultations with colonial governments. — Signs of the times: interest in the Queen's Jubilee, 1887; the Imperial Institute; King Edward's title, 1901; use of colonial and Indian contingents in the Sudan, in the South African War, and in the Boxer movement; federation within colonial groups (Canada, Australia, West Indies, South Africa).
